Some Legal - Theoretical Problems of Increasing Crime Prevention by Means of the Socialist Legal System

by Hans Weber and Heinz Wolf

The development of the socialist legal order is an essential part of the development of the political-social system of the struggle against and prevention of crime and its partial systems. This demands for the creation of a harmonic system of socialist law which exactly enacts the rights, duties and responsibilities and thus prevents social misbehaviour to the greatest possible extent. With the growing complexity and interplay of social life the determination of the correct standards of guidance reaches a higher importance for the regulation of social behaviour of the individuals. The stability of the developed social system of socialism and the being free from interruptions of the processes of the social development taking place in its frame depend to an essential part on the quality of the standards of guidance for this system, among this also on the legal norms. The growing division of labour and cooperation make necessary a more exact determination of the spheres of responsibility of the citizens, a reification of their duties and a better survey of them. This promotes the realization of legality and order. With the speedier social development and the quick increase and growing obsolete of human knowledge new problems arise for the legislation especially the necessity of an improvement of processing of the informations necessary for legislation. It is of importance for the efficiency and stability of the socialist law to prognosticate the possible consequences of certain legislative projects and to develop corresponding methods and proceedings. The exact determination of the responsibility for the legislation is also of special importance.
